Now the last principle in the power of persuasion I'm going to discuss is the scarcity principle. We all understand that if diamonds grew on trees and littered the ground nobody would think much of them. What makes them so valuable is their relative scarcity. There just aren't that many of them around.

People with the power of persuasion know how to use triggers properly in order to influence those around them. There are several actions we do automatically, such as walking and chewing, i.e., you don't need to stop and think about it while you are performing these two movements; they're done involuntarily.
