In this TV Guide article published during his run for the presidency, Senator John F. Kennedy (1917-1963) discussed the effects of television on the political process. While warning about the potential for manipulation and the rising cost of campaigns due to the medium, Kennedy charged the "viewing public" with the responsibility to use their "power" to determine television's ultimate impact on American politics.

Even more than radio, television allows politicians to reach out and connect with citizens and voters in deeper ways. Before television, few voters were able to see a president or candidate speak or answer questions in an interview. Now everyone can decode body language and tone to decide whether candidates or politicians are sincere.
