What happened in the US elections does not represent a constitutional crisis. It is rather what the Italian social theorist Antonio Gramsci in the 1920s described as a "crisis of representation," one in which the links between parties and their putative/real constituencies break down.

A Crisis Of Representation, Not Of The Constitution ...

And they became meaningless: every crisis is judged to be one that is constitutional. I think part of the reason that today feels like a crisis is because the legislative branch is not functioning. When you have a legislature that isn't doing its job, and the president is acting beyond his authority, and you have no check on that—you may be in a crisis.
