In the immediate, postwar period, France had the strongest array and the biggest tank force with more than 2,000 tanks. This, together with various political and economic circumstances, added considerable weight to French ideas on the subject of tanks. Anyway, in the 1920s, they were adopted by virtually all other countries.

Realizing their tank force was largely inadequate in dealing with Allied armor across the Pacific Campaign, the Imperial Japanese Army (IJA) enacted a new program to produce an increasingly capable design to counter the 30-ton American M4 Sherman appearing in ever greater numbers. As the direct "M4 Sherman-Counter" - the 30-ton Type 4 "Chi-To" - was inevitably delayed, work began on modifying the existing 15-ton Type 97 "Chi-Ha" as an interim measure.
